HFa 03/2019 - Betenkning – Førsteamanuensis i engelsk ved Institutt for språk og litteratur, fast 100 % stilling.

Vedtak:

Det humanistiske fakultet viser til forslag av 06.02.2019 fra Institutt for språk og litteratur, og vedtar følgende betenkning for 100 % fast stilling som førsteamanuensis i engelsk. Ønsket oppstart 01.01.2020

A full-time, permanent position as Associate Professor in modern/contemporary Anglophone literature is available with the English section of the Department of Language and Literature (ISL), NTNU, with an anticipated start date of 1 January 2020.

The English section currently has 21 permanent employees within three broad areas of specialization—linguistics, literature, and cultural studies—of which six are permanent staff in literature studies. The literature group of the section is actively engaged in individual and collaborative research projects, and is involved in local and wider networks which cross disciplinary and linguistic boundaries. It offers Bachelor, Master's, and PhD education within a broad spectrum of courses in campus-based programs, and offers continuing education credits in an active distance program. For more information about the department please visit our website.

Position responsibilities

It is expected that the employee will

- pursue research within the discipline and publish regularly in respected international outlets.
- teach and supervise in relevant courses at all levels, both within the regular and teacher training programs and EVU (distance and continuing education) offering. While most of the teaching may be research based, the employee must be prepared to teach and supervise outside of his/her research area.

- participate in exam work as well as administrative assignments.
- contribute actively to student recruitment and program quality development.
- lead and initiate research, pursue research supervision, and work actively to establish externally financed research projects.

The language of teaching and supervision for this position is English. Administration in the department is predominantly conducted in Norwegian.

Qualification requirements

- a PhD in a relevant area of modern/contemporary Anglophone literature;
- an active research profile and well-developed plans for future projects and possible collaborations;
- a track record of publications (in print or under contract) in international, refereed venues;
- experience in designing and delivering research-based and survey courses in Anglophone literature;
- excellent competence in oral and written English.

Qualifications which are desirable (in no particular order)

- advanced pedagogical experience, including curriculum development, supervision at graduate levels, development of new teaching methods, and working in both campus and online/distance education courses;
- active involvement in externally funded research projects
- a record of administrative service;
- ability and experience with interdisciplinary work;
- experience of public engagement and outreach;
- knowledge of the role of English in the Norwegian education system and society.

All applications should explicitly address the above criteria in their cover letter (see Application Requirements below). Candidates with a research and teaching record within areas of particular relevance to the research of the department and the teaching portfolio of the section will be preferred. The candidate's own personal suitability, ability to work well with others and to contribute to an inclusive work environment, and motivation for the position will also be considered.
